Noteworthy, the number of human subtags was significantly higher than the number of subtags present in the H. sapiens reference genome, which is suspected to be biased towards high copy number chromosomal regions. Therefore, the number of subtags can be lower in case of genome-wide study. In H. sapiens, the number of subtags per library was almost constant for all FACS-based libraries that were included in the analysis and ranged from 17,000 to 20,000. Given a genome size of about 3.8 Gb, the average number of subtags is approximately 6000. For this reason, it can be stated that sequencing with 5--10 Mb of size and only 24--48 Mb of reads for each sequencing lane is sufficient to detect the majority of subtags present in human blood. 10.5256/f1000research.10446.r17849 Referee response for version 1 Petti Claudio 1 Referee Department of Immunology, Institute for Clinical Research and Education in Immunology and Allergy (CIAI), University of São Paulo, São Paulo, Brazil Competing interests:No competing interests were disclosed. 18 9 2017 Version 1 The manuscript by Silva et al. tries to answer the question of whether NGS is able to "solve" the f678ea9f9e
